Figuring out life one educated guess at a time

Guess peeing the bed is for post op trans girls too! (SRS +6)

So in about thirty minutes I get my catheter out. I'm not at all worried, some girls are and turn it into a big thing. Which makes it harder to pee naturally. However I'm not concerned. Last night about midnight I woke up and felt like I had to pee which was unusual since I had this catheter put in.

So I start peeing like normal without a catheter and felt this wetness on my leg. I reach down and sure enough it's wet. I quickly realized the rest of the wet warmth below me and that I peed the bed with a catheter in still. So I guess that means I can go without a catheter. Sweet.

Unfortunately hospital staff just put an absorbent pad down and left. So I added another plus a towel and needles to say can't wait for a shower. They woke me up at 6, tied off the useless catheter bag, and injected an antibiotic through my iv.

Currently I'm downing water, have my gf getting me coffee, and already have to pee so this should be pretty easy. They do give a pain killer before. I'll update this post after it's out. Also I'll be dilating for the first time. I'll update this post after it's out and that's done.... To be continued...

Update (+3 hours): so that's been a lot of excitement and things happening. First Dr Suporn removed the small packing between the labia lips. Then he removed the tape worm that was packed into my vaginal cavity (seriously, it was brown, went on forever, and looked like a tapeworm). That felt weird as I could feel it slowly coming out deeper and deeper.

Then came time to remove the catheter. I'd read this was painful. It wasn't. At all. Maybe the pain meds they gave fixed that, maybe it just was my body healed enough it wasn't painful. Whatever. I'm cool with it.

Next up was dilation. It was really a strange feeling, not good or bad. Just a fullness. I hit 17 cm (6.5 inches). It didn't hurt either. Just felt filled with something. It'll be interesting to see how I feel about this over time. Right now it's so new and a lot going on.

Finally was "go pee". I drank about 2.5 liters of water over a few hours, and just now that resulted in coming out. Unfortunately for me, things don't work like they used to and I started before I got to the toilet. Guess that'll take some getting used to. But means no more catheter. Or any tube! Yay!

Now time to pack up our stuff from the hospital, go say hi to other patients, and head back to the hotel in about two hours. Yay! Farewell the final resting place of my balls!
